MULTIPLE TIMELINES REQUIRE COORDINATION

after interviewing vendors of 116th st. and the neighboring streets at various times of the day and distinct days of the week, we were able to begin to map out various strands of vendors and their possible spatial needs. this timeline was crucial for understanding bottlenecks with such a shared space while also allowing us to imagine further activities and find possible synergies.

A DYNAMIC STOREFRONT

we are excited by all the different permutations of communal use that can happen within a previous static space. By opening the standard footprint in a radically connective and shuffleable manner, multiple scenarios serving distinct groups can be going on at any given moment.

these scenarios are only a few examples of the many iterations that can be configured using the ingenuity already required to be a successful street vendor
